

Matt Dodson

Leader, Development Manager, and Executive Coach

Matt Dodson is currently responsible for Leader Development in the Capital Projects function at Chevron. In this role, he's been a catalyst for change, helping those around him understand the integral role leadership plays in achieving success both day-to-day and long-term.

Prior to that, he was the program manager for the CEO's Advanced Management Program for future executives and was responsible for and facilitated other nominated corporate programs. Within the last 10 years, he has focused on all aspects of leader and employee development from identification, selection, assessment, succession, and development.

He joined Chevron in 2000 and has been involved in all parts of the crude-to-customer value chain which brings the energy that improves lives and powers the world forward.

Matt earned his bachelor's degree in Business from Pepperdine University in Malibu, California, and his master's in Business Administration from the University of California at Davis. Matt and his wife, Allie, have been married since 1999 and have two children. His interests include running, reading, and counseling. He currently resides in Sugar Land, Texas.